

https://www.crossroadstoday.com/news/non-profit-group-protests-the-act-of-circumcision-on-navarro/article_c4912291-492f-5b3a-875e-3ccbfb90c3.html

Non-profit group protests the act of circumcision on Navarro

By Daryan Jones

Oct 23, 2018

A non-profit organization is protesting the act of circumcision here in Victoria, a procedure they claim is harming America's baby boys.

The Bloodstained Men were seen protesting early Monday morning on Navarro, calling on Victorians to end the practice they say is both harmful and unnecessary.

Spokesperson Harry Guiremand says circumcision is an outdated procedure all but outlawed in Europe. He adds the procedure does not prevent disease and instead causes permanent damage to the boy's most sensitive area.

Guiremand implores parents to end the practice of circumcision, for the sake of their baby boy.

"It's so important to respect the right of your child to his own body," Guiremand said. "You wouldn't cut off any other part of your child's body, you shouldn't make an exception for cutting off part of his penis."

The organization will continue their protest in a twenty two day tour, stretching all the way to Florida before ending in Houston.

About the Bloodstained Men (from their website).

Bloodstained Men as an organization can trace its origin to the decision of late intactivist leader Jonathon Conte to bring seven sets of white painters overalls marked with red crotches to the protest at the October 2012 American Academy of Pediatrics convention protest in New Orleans. Though the visually arresting bloodstained crotch protest concept was a 2010 creation of British intactivist Richard Duncker, Conte's deployment of the suit was the first example in the United States and was the spark for our organization. Seven men boldly wore these suits outside the convention hall, causing quite a sensation among the conference attendees and veteran demonstrators alike.